Statement of Teaching Philosophy

In my opinion, to teach is to be able to impart individuals with knowledge and insight. It is an occasion to guide students in their understanding of concepts and principles. The prospect of training students to apply their newly obtained knowledge, to develop and use their critical thinking skills, and encourage them in their search for wisdom is an exciting challenge each semester.

Teaching is one of my talents, but I've also spent numerous hours refining my teaching skills. I am an enthusiastic and energetic speaker who has learned to capture and hold students' attention and interest. It is crucial to form a connection, a bond, an alliance with students in their educational journey. Students consistently report that my openness and genuine concern for them often surprises them, but is always welcome.

I teach facts. But I also teach concepts and general principles that students can apply to improve the quality of their lives and the lives of others. I believe education is one of the key factors in dealing with the challenges facing society. I strive to illustrate the many applications of knowledge to my students.

My desire to inspire students to think critically about issues and their consequences has motivated me to dedicate my life to teaching. Life is learning and I continue to learn from my students as well.
